THE manicou crab.

Naturalist's view of Macajuel Pond

THE T&T Field Naturalists' Club journeyed to Macajuel Pond on May 31.

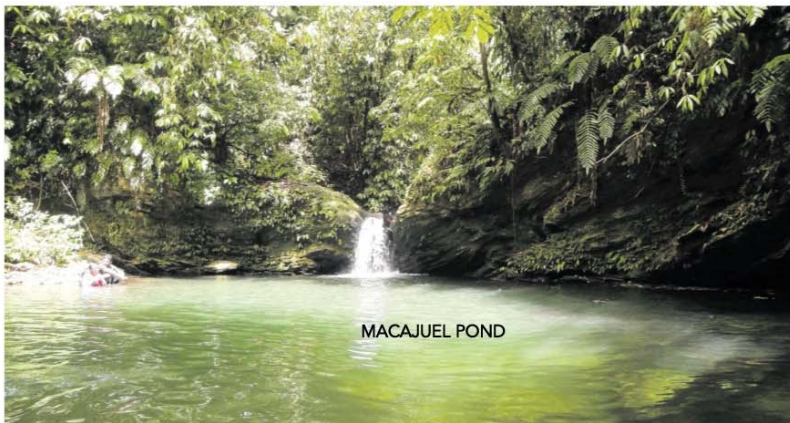

With the rainy season just beginning, the water level was perfect for safely exploring the boulder-filled stream along the way. Here the stream was fringed by the beautiful maraval lily (Spathiphyllum cannifolium) while the cooperhoop (Brownea coccinea) was one of many forest trees growing higher up the bank. Several fishes, including the ever-present jumping guabine (Aneblepsoides hartii) can be found in the streams here.

In keeping with the serpentine theme of the area, a total of four mapeire balsain or fern-dance (Bothrops cf asper) were seen in or near the stream.

THE mapepire balsain or fer-de-lance.

Mapepire bites are rare

This snake is one of four venomous snakes in the country.
Despite their deadly venom, reports of bites from a mapepire are relatively uncommon and fatalities are even rarer.
Nonetheless, caution is always advised when dealing with our venomous snakes.

Another inhabitant of these mountain streams is the manicou (Eudaniella garmani). They are called manicou crabs on account of their habit of transporting their young in a brood chamber on their undersides, similar to the manner in which opossums sometimes carry their young. The baby crabs will stay there until their first moult, after which they will be released into a stream. Manicou crabs are hunted for food by humans and in some areas the population has fallen considerably.
